Doing a PhD is often looked upon as a solo-enterprise. However, one of the aspects that I most enjoyed is all the people that I have met and how much I have learned from them. Though full of wonderful new experiences, my life as a PhD researcher has not always been an easy one. I have had to deal with numerous logistic and intellectual challenges that I would not have been able to overcome without the help and encouragement of many people, some of whom I would like to give special thanks to.

First of all I would like to thank my supervisors, Ruud Koopmans and Sawitri Saharso. Ruud has encouraged me to set ambitious goals in both methodological and theoretical terms and taught me not be discouraged by what other people think. Our many discussions were a great intellectual stimulus and have always pushed me to rethink and reformulate my arguments. Sawitri has not only motivated me to further develop my theoretical arguments, but also provided crucial moral support at times of the unavoidable research problems. I have learned a lot from her pragmatic approach to problem solving. I look forward to future research collaborations with both my supervisors.

For the research design and data analyses I have not only received advice from my supervisors but also from several other scholars. In particular I would like to thank Nermin Abadan-Unat, Ahmet Akgündüz, Jan Willem Duyvendak, Jak den Exter, Merove Gijsberts, Betty de Hart and Maarten Vink for providing valuable input. The help of Christian Galonska and Patrick Simon was indispensable for the success of the data collection. I would also like to thank Maarten Buis who was always willing to provide statistical advice and Sandra Groeneveld who gave advice on the questionnaire design.

My colleagues at the sociology department of the Vrije Universiteit, especially those of the SCC group provided a pleasant working atmosphere. My officemates Inger, Heike, Rens, Robert, David, Diana and my 'foster officemates' Susanne and Jasper deserve a special mentioning. I have enjoyed our conversations on a large range of topics accompanied by many cups of tea and maybe slightly too many cookies and too much chocolate. Thank you for all your advice on theoretical, logistic and statistical matters and, not to forget, on life itself. I would also like to thank Jacquélien for showing the bright side of almost everything.

Luckily being a PhD is a faith shared by many and I enjoyed the meetings with the Gümüz-PhDclub and with Saskia Bonjour and Melanie Eijberts. They have provided constructive feedback and moral support, for which I'm thankful.

The last few months of writing I spent at the MIT department of the WZB in Berlin. I quickly felt at home there, and am sorry to leave so soon. Thank you for providing such an inspiring work environment.

There is more to life than work and I am very grateful to have a group of good friends who have supported me throughout my PhD trajectory. In particular I would like to thank Afke, Gehan, Joost, Lobke, Loes, Servaz, Kai, Roos, and Marjolijn, for their support these past years. I could always count on them, even in the middle of the night. Fortunately there was also time for dinners, parties, theater and sauna visits and not to forget: weddings! I owe a lot to my parents. Since the day I started school they have always been supportive of me. It is much easier to aim high when you know there is someone there to catch you when you fall. It is to them that I dedicate this thesis.

It is all too easily forgotten that most social scientific research is not possible without the willingness of respondents to participate. I would therefore like to end by thanking all the respondents for giving their time to this research project. In particular I would like to thank the respondents of the in-depth interviews who not only gave me several hours of their time but also spoiled me with wonderful foods and drinks. Most importantly, they were willing to share their stories with me. During the data collection phase I have worked with many young people of Turkish descent who worked as bilingual interviewers on the telephone survey or as interpreters at some of the in-depth interviews. I have enjoyed the conversations we had and the commitment to the project that many of them have shown. Çok teþekkür ederim.
