Having finished my dissertation, I would like to thank all who have inspired and supported me in various ways.

In particular, I would like to thank Jaap Doek for offering me the opportunity to enroll my PhD research at the VU University Amsterdam and for his trust and inspiring guidance. I would also like to thank the distinguished members of the thesis committee, Matthias Borgers, Sharon Detrick, Bernardine Dohrn, Gerard de Jonge, Martin Kuijer and Ido Weijers, for their time and efforts to review the manuscript and to provide me with their valuable comments.

The decision to enroll my PhD research was a spin-off of a growing interest in juvenile law and children’s rights both in the Netherlands and abroad, particularly during the final two years of my legal studies at the VU University. This growing interest was largely instigated by the opportunity to get in touch and work with some inspiring people. One of them was Robbie Robinson. Prof. Robbie introduced me to ‘world of children’s rights’ during the first children’s rights course at the VU University. It resulted in my visit to his university a few months later, in order to conduct research on the South African juvenile justice system. I would like to thank him for his friendship and for being such a constant source of inspiration to me.

During my research I had the privilege to meet many people who have in one way or the other inspired me, supported me or provided me with insights, ideas and information. I thank some people in particular.

First, I thank Bernardine Dohrn, whose thoughts, ideas and work have been a great source of inspiration to me. I am grateful for her enthusiastic support and encouragement. I would also like to thank her for the opportunity to come over to Chicago and broaden my horizon by digging into the Illinois juvenile justice system and some of its youth institutions.

In this regard, I would also like to thank Bart Lubow from the Annie E. Casey Foundation in Baltimore for his invitation to host me in Maryland and Washington D.C. Both visits have contributed to my own ‘evolving capacities’ and also to the ‘maturity’ of this dissertation. Moreover, Bernardine Dohrn’s and Bart Lubow’s successful efforts to reform the US juvenile justice system set great examples.

Furthermore I would like to thank all the people I met in and around youth institutions in the Netherlands and abroad during site visits, field trips, etc. They confirmed to me that the quality of treatment of children in institutions is significantly determined by those working directly with or for these children. Their hard work and good intentions are vital. The people I met generally gave me a positive feeling and strengthened my belief in a future perspective in which the rights of children deprived of their liberty are fully respected. Even though there are too many who do a lot of harm to children (and to the reputation of institutional staff), one woman or man can make a significant difference by providing children deprived of their liberty with a role model and hope for the future.

I would also like to thank the administrations and staff of Dutch youth institutions, supervisory committees, the Dutch Ministry of Justice, more specifically the National Agency for Correctional Institutions and the secretariat of The Netherlands (DCI) for its support and financial contribution to the printing of this manuscript. More specifically, I thank Sharon Detrick for her participation in the thesis committee and Stan Meuwese, DCI’s former director, who has shown particular interest in this research and supported me in different ways. I thank all others from DCI and the editorial board of the Journal for the Rights of the Child their interest and support. I hope this book can contribute to DCI’s significant work in the Netherlands and abroad.

Above all, I would like to thank the children I met in institutions, courts and their communities in the Netherlands and abroad. They provided me with information and insights, that I could never have received from adults. The curiosity, directness and unambiguous questions and answers of these children have proven to me that their rights should never be taken lightly. Children deprived of their liberty have the right to be taken seriously, also in academic research. I would like to dedicate this book to them.

There are many others who have contributed to this dissertation in various ways, including my (former) colleagues from the VU University and the Amsterdam Center for Child Studies, in particular those who (used to) belong to the section of family and juvenile law, and my new colleagues at the Willem Pompe Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology in Utrecht.

I would like to mention Geeske Ruitenber, Kees Blankman and Masha Antokolskaia in particular. In addition, I thank Frances Gilligan for the editing of my draft-manuscript and Wieneka Matthijesse for the suggestions regarding the typesetting of this book.

Furthermore, I would like to thank Mariëlle Bruning, Jeanette Kok, Mark Springer, Eddie Bongers and Don Cipriani for their particular interest, support and friendship. A special thank you to Mila Volf for her unconditional trust, friendship and support in many ways.
Finally, I thank my sister Marleen Liefaard, Vincent Scheelings and my family in law for their loving support and interest. I am particularly grateful to my parents, Ton & Jannie Liefaard, who have provided me with continuous love and guidance, not only through the final stages of this study, but more importantly through my life thus far. Words cannot express my gratitude to them.

I conclude by thanking the woman I admire for her determination to become a true person, daughter, wife and illustrator, and who has been my truest supporter for a long time. Thank you, my Lady.

Ton Liefaard
Amstelveen, August 2008 ‘Time is an ocean of endless tears’

Paul Simon & Derek Walcott (1997) – ‘Songs From The Capeman’