CONTENTS

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

PREFACE

INTRODUCTION: Insecurity, storytelling and Estonia’s recent past

Setting the scene

The War of Monuments and its aftermath

Positioning this research: An anthropology of post-Soviet remembering

Estonia as part of the post-Socialist world

The research setting

Getting acquainted with my informants

Gathering the data: research methods and decisions

Anthropological reflection

Surveys

Structure of the thesis

CHAPTER 1: Born from the land: Preserving roots and cultural traditions

Belonging, roots and the national home

The historical ties of a people, its land and folklore

Before 1860: ‘People of the land’ – maarahvas, class identification

1860 – 1918: From maarahvas to an ethnic group

1918 – 1939: ‘Estonian time’, from an ethnic group to a nation-state

1939 – 1991: WWII and ‘Russian time’, the loss of land

1987 – early 1990s: the Singing Revolution and the ‘natural order’

Romanticising home

Natural ties to the family’s land

To care about place

Truly Estonian

Ethnicised times

Concluding remarks

CHAPTER 2: A collective story of Soviet repression

From individual to collective stories

Historical antecedents to the Soviet repressions of the 1940s

Silence, safe spaces and the representation by others
“Double consciousness” and silence in the Soviet era 92
The end of an era of silence 94
The wish to be voiced by one’s compatriots 97
‘Privilege’ of the experienced? 101
Defining ‘the experienced’ 103
Concluding remarks 104

CHAPTER 3: REWRITING HISTORY: RESTORING THE SOCIAL ORDER 107
Collective stories of the past 108
History writing 110
History and memory politics 111
Cultural productions of the past 113
1860s–1930s: The creation of a collective story of the Estonian nation 114
   The National Awakening: Estophile intellectuals in the age of Romanticism 114
   The foundation of the Republic of Estonia: Spreading the story through state formation 115
Post-WWII–early 1990s: Official and unofficial memory work under Soviet oppression 116
   1980s: Memory work in times of dawn 119
   1986-1988: The wish for autonomy in dissident and intellectual circles 119
   1988-1990: Gaining legitimacy within the ‘second society’ 121
   Political participation in the ‘first society’ 123
   1990-1991: Discussion among the new political elite 125
   The legal victory of restorationism 127
Early 1990s: Memory politics, historiography, cultural memory and family stories as one 130
   The Republic of Historians 133
Late 1990s–2004: The comeback of counter-stories 137
Since 2004: Post-accession ‘democratic backsliding’ 141
Concluding remarks 144

CHAPTER 4: POSTMEMORY: THE INHERITED OBLIGATION TO SECURE THE FUTURE 147
Postmemory, solidarity and moral obligation 149
Estonia’s ‘Singing Revolution’ and ‘belated postmemory’ 152
   Generation 1940-1955 153
   Generation 1955-1970 154
   Generation 1970s 157
   Generation 1980s 160
Moral obligations in Estonian society at large 162
   “The continuation of Estonia depends on every one of us” 165
   Increased insecurity: “fed by fear with their mother’s milk” 170
Between moral obligations and individual freedom 173
Concluding remarks 176

CHAPTER 5: COMMITTED TO THE PAST: MEMORY ACTIVISTS IN SEARCH OF TRUTH AND JUSTICE 179
Everyday obsessions with the past 181
Three memory activists 189
Memory activism as a social movement 193
“The sword of Damocles”: contemporary insecurities 196
Localising Tartu’s memory activists 200
Roots of anti-Soviet dissidence, human rights activism and friendship 202
Becoming a Tartu memory activist 209
Friendship between generations of fighters for justice and order 214
Support for the memory activists in the wider society 215
Concluding remarks 221

CHAPTER 6: ON THE MARGINS OF HISTORY: GOOD OLD SOVIET TIMES 223
Economic development, pleasure and egalitarianism in the ESSR 225
Economic growth 226
Culture, leisure and pleasure 226
Egalitarianism and social mobility 228
Adaptation 229
‘Normal’ Soviet life in the post-Soviet public realm 230
Cultural figures and intellectuals talking about normal Soviet life 231
The political threat of nostalgia 232
The strength of the rupture narrative 235
Positive Soviet evaluations in Estonian society at large 237
Estonians with positive Soviet stories 246
“At that time it was just normal” 247
Feeling excluded from the mnemonic community 250
Political lies, rural truths 252
Authentic memories, a better Estonian 255
Concluding remarks 260

CHAPTER 7: WWII ON THE PERIPHERY OF EUROPE: A CONTESTED CHAPTER 263
Remembering WWII 265
WWII in Soviet historiography 266
WWII in Estonian post-Soviet historiography 268
WWII remembrance as part of the European family 269
The perceived superiority of Western European memories of WWII 275
The perceived ambiguity and inferiority of Estonian WWII memories 277
  Estonian families on both sides of the war 277
  Ambiguous story lines 278
  Lack of a clear political stance 280
Emotions of insecurity: torn between the past and the future 283
  Are we fully Europeans? 284
  European citizens with Estonian duties 287
Concluding remarks 290

CONCLUSION: Guardians of living history 293
The vulnerability of story telling 293
A living national (hi)story 295
Guardians of the past 296
Individual and collective acts of preservation 299
The paradox of closure 301

APPENDIX 305
REFERENCES 308
SUMMARY 325
SAMENVATTING 327
KOKKUVÕTE 330