A growing number of twin and family studies provide evidence that a substantial part of the variation in voluntary exercise behavior is determined by genetic predisposition. Starting in adolescence, an increase is observed in heritability estimates, which are consistently moderate to high at the ages of 16 to 18, continuing into young adulthood. The aim of this thesis was to identify the mechanisms that give rise to this heritability of voluntary exercise behavior in adolescents and young adults.